This is another milestone for our Journal, Global Medical and Health Communication (GMHC). Starting from this volume in August 2018, GMHC will only publish in English. This move is following our mission to be involved in the global arena.¹ The best approach is by publishing in one of United Nation Language official and working languages, and we choose English.

This month is chosen because this month, more accurately on August 17, 2018, our country celebrates the 73rd anniversary of our Independence Day. It is the best moment for us to stepping up, to be better at what we do.

The journal need to reconfiguring itself to catch up with the demand of our time. It has to leave its comfortable environment to navigate a newer and better way. Challenges face us in every direction. Hopefully, with the new approach, GMHC will be expanding its level of influence.

Our gratitude to all researchers, lectures and other health practitioners who support us from the very beginning by submitting their original research articles and also to our reviewers which contributed to make GMHC a better journal.

Let's embraces our new challenges by prepared to think differently.
